

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PREFACE.

In presenting to the public the following Collection of Memorials for Faithful Servitude, it may, perhaps, be necessary briefly to mention the views which first induced the author to notice their frequent recurrence, and now to submit them to more general regard, together with some few observations on the subject relative to the present state of that class of society in this country.

It may not unfrequently have been remarked, mong what is usually denominated the middle ranks f life, where servants are more immediately under he surveillance of the heads of families, that rather a eneral feeling at the present day prevails, as to the arcity of valuable domestics; forming a frequent subject of complaint, and thereby producing a sort of unqualified condemnation of a very numerous class, who, interwoven as they are with our domestic comforts and general security, must necessarily, in most instances, stand higher in the scale of moral conduct than we may, from some exceptions, have been induced to believe.

One or two memorials in the immediate vicinity of the author's residence, raised as a tribute to departed worth, in a station of life seldom much regarded, first engendered a wish to collect, if possible, some few further specimens, with a view of occasionally producing them as a proof that instances of integrity and personal attachment were not altogether so rare as many would infer, in a class more frequently, as he conceived, depreciated from the conduct of individuals, than an extended view of society would justly warrant:

The intention at first was, to select about ten or a dozen (supposing it practicable, of which, however, the collector himself was somewhat dubious—an opinion which is even expressed in some of the following inscriptions, and by many believed only to exist in the delusive pages of romance;) but, as when we turn our attention to any particular pursuit, it commonly happens, that we find it claiming our regard in a more peculiar manner than our previous ideas would always appear to justify, so, in the present instance, it certainly "grew with our growth, and strengthened with our strength," till the author very soon found, that the collection began to assume an extent which would justify something beyond a mere local circulation. It then appeared to him, not only possible to make a genuine selection for private inspection, but that it might be also worthy f public notice; and, upon further reflection, he onceived that, even in a national point of view, ich a work would be of some importance, as tendg to raise the moral character of the country, and at the general circulation thereof might materially I in encouraging that praiseworthy character in lividuals, the correct conduct of whom, though of erior station, is most assuredly essential to the ppiness of every rank in life.

There appears to be a peculiar recommendation attending the present work, not always to be predicated of collections of a like nature; many of which, however faithfully given, may in some, perhaps in most instances, be liable to a certain degree of suspicion as to their strict veracity. In the memorials inscribed to public characters from national gratitude. some trifling exaggeration may be expected; in the partial, though affectionate, descriptions of departed relatives, much may be allowed for the feelings of survivors; in the monuments erected to the honour of benefactors to the public, or individuals, a little enlargement may be pardoned; and in all, generally speaking, a certain portion of vanity and panegyric may be suspected, either in the motives of the survivors, or as regards the virtues of the deceased.

But these testimonials, from their very nature, carry incontrovertible evidence in favour of the genuine verity of their inscriptions; and most indubitably prove, that however they may evince the grateful feelings of the living for past services, and demonstrate their existing sense of departed worth, yet, that not a doubt can exist of their having been placed there from a thorough conviction of real merit in the deceased. In a few instances it may be possible (though we are certainly not warranted in the assumption) that some slight spark of self-approving vanity in the survivors may be mixed up with the desire of recording the faithful past services of a valued and attached domestic; still the essential qualities of moral worth and integrity must have been actually existant, to have given cause for such memorials; and in many, very many instances, we shall find even this doubtful assumption wholly untenable, from the self-evident circumstance of their being inscribed without any family name being there recorded, so that the observant stranger knows only that such was the servant whom some unknown master thought worthy of such grateful and, surely, honourable distinction.

In an early stage of this collection, which was only commenced in the Autumn of 1822, and occasionally continued in the course of a few excursions through various parts of England, it is more than probable, that several may have been passed unnoticed, before it began to assume a complexion of sufficient extent to warrant the present arrangement. When, however, the instances began to multiply, upon more frequent and closer inspection of the frail memorials of mortality, the author, contemplating a more extended view of the subject, and being seriously impressed, from the reasons before mentioned, with its general importance, determined to lay hold of every opportunity to collect a sufficient number of specimens to warrant his laying before the public a work which, in his humble opinion, does honour to human nature; a work, too, which he believes has no parallel in Europe; and he thinks he may be warranted in the assertion, that no country in the modern world can produce so many established evidences of fidelity and worth on the one part, and grateful feeling and regard on the other. Much has been recently said in favour of the Parisian cemetery of Père le Chaise, and much genuine sentiment is there displayed; yet there are very few, if, indeed, any, instances (none that the author has ever seen) of a similar nature; for, though much pure, unadulterated feeling, and tender remembrance, reign throughout that hallowed spot, yet is it generally evinced in family regard, and the affectionate affinities of consanguinity or friendship. Not so in the present undertaking; here undisguised and unequivocal recognizances of innate worth and attachments, springing from the best and most estimable feelings, and the real practical virtues of useful life, are exhibited in numerous instances, and that, apparently, not confined to any local district, but (at least as far as the author has had opportunities of judging) as a general sentiment throughout the kingdom for a very considerable period.

Should the present attempt meet the encouraging approbation of the public, the author would be aduced to bestow some attention towards extending ne work, and it might even be expedient to use further exertions in obtaining a more general collection and the one now offered for inspection. These it ay be requisite to observe, were, with the exception of some few distinguished by initial letters, all copied verbatim on the spot by the author, and the few exceptions which do occur, were obtained from those on whose correctness he can safely rely for accuracy; a comparison with the originals, where practicable, will sufficiently vouch for the verity of the others.

It has been at times a cherished idea with the author, that it might hereafter be thought of importance sufficient to warrant an endeavour to obtain, by correspondence or otherwise, a collection as complete as the nature of the thing would admit, up to the present period. Should this ever be attempted, it would, perhaps, be but justice to those, whose estimable feelings have prompted them to raise these memorials to their faithful dependents, to rescue their names, also, from that oblivion to which an amiable modesty in withholding their personal identity, has apparently consigned them.

That few are aware of the actual number of these memorials, is not only extremely probable, but moreover singularly exemplified in several of the respective inscriptions;* from which it is evident, that they themselves considered a faithful domestic as a rare occurrence; happy will the author esteem himself, if any humble efforts of his may tend to shew the fallacy of such opinions, and be the means of proving, that in this respect human nature is not so degraded as many would, from superficial views, infer, as regards that numerous and very useful class of society-our household servants; he thinks it due to them to maintain, that unfavourable opinions, collectively taken, are not borne out by facts; and if we consider the amount of those in actual servitude throughout the kingdom, looking at the few, comparatively very few, convicted of any capital offences, and the general confidence necessarily reposed in them, with the great extent of property constantly intrusted to their care, it may be very fairly preumed, that there is no other walk of life better or nore correctly sustained, and that, in numerous istances, general conduct and individual character ave been, not simply unimpeachable, but highly eritorious.

Leaving the present undertaking to the patronage of that public, whose collective character must ever receive additional lustre from individual merit, in whatever station it may appear, the author begs to subscribe himself,

Their sincere well-wisher,

This Stone is erected, as a grateful record, that in the Service of the Vicar of this Parish, he was uniformly distinguished by his Honesty, Integrity & Veracity; exhibiting in an humble station, many qualities which would have adorned a higher: such indeed as secure friends and esteem on earth, for honour and immortality in Heaven.
